

Dear Sir:

The FCC in the past has equitably managed America's airwaves, and has admirably handled the Herculean task of making rules for the nation's media providers, carriers and private consumers. Part of this task is ensuring robust competition between sources of information, so that no one source, or small number of sources can control the bulk of content.

Yet the past several years have a disturbing trend of consolidation among content providers, thanks both to increasingly competitive markets and a host of technological innovations that allow a single piece of information to almost instantaneously reach millions of people. I fear that if the rules governing consolidation of content providers are relaxed, this trend will continue further, narrowing the field of choices of the private citizen.

To ensure that true competition is preserved in the American media, I urge the FCC not to relax the rules governing corporate ownership of news providers. Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,
Ehren J. Brav
